Malden HS students are hosted at inspiring visit to NE Holocaust Memorial

BOSTON – Malden High School students were special guests during an inspiring visit at the New England Holocaust Memorial Wednesday, September 13. Accompanied by Malden Mayor Gary Christenson, School Superintendent John Oteri, Malden High principal Ted Lombardi and other school and city officials, the students learned about the horrors of the Holocaust from 92-year-old Israel Arbeiter, a survivor of the Nazi terror. Several of our students also took part in a ceremonial reading of obituaries of Holocaust victims, with the life stories prepared by the victims' families and filed with the Memorial archivists. "It was moving and memorable experience for these students," MHS Principal Lombardi said.

Internationally known Stolpersteine project comes to Malden High School

Over 500 Malden High School students over two days were the recipients of an informative lecture-style education about an international program based in Germany where victims of the Holocaust are honored and memorialized. The program is called Stolpersteine, or, "Stumbling Stones". It is a program where small metal plates are filled with information permanently inscribed with the names and birth and death dates of some Holocaust victims. The plates, handmade by one independent artist, are then placed in front of the homes where the victims formerly lived. Malden High teachers Greg Hurley and Daniel Aubeiro have led the push to have Malden High students raise money and purchase some of the Stumbling Stones in honor of some speakers who have spoken at Malden High School in the past. Mr. Hurley, MHS principal Ted Lombardi and several MHS students appeared before the Malden School Committee last week and spoke about their endeavors.
